4 Double Postcards

General Rules

Double postcards, including the response card, should be fully paid for by the sender.

The response part should be separated from the double postcard when it was returned. However, the practice to return both cards seems to have been widely accepted.

The sender of a double postcard was allowed to type or print his or her address on the response card. This was of course needed if the sender was unknown to the addressee.

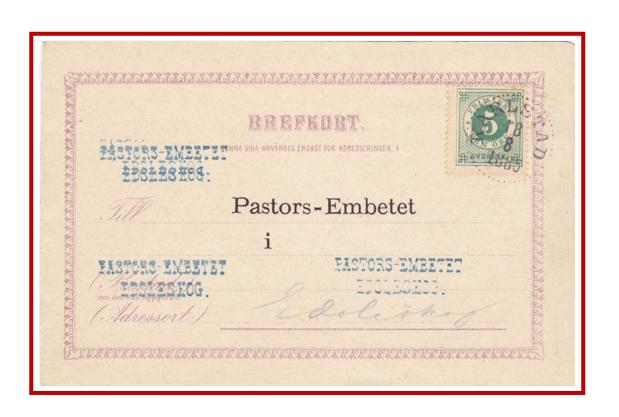

Privately Printed Double Postcards

Privately printed double postcards paid with stamps are extremely rare [Billgren & Andersson, p. 97]. The card below is one of the earlies known and it is depicted in Billgren & Andersson.

UPU Agreement in 1886

UPU allowed double postcards to be exchanged between its members from 1 April 1886.

Prior to UPU Agreement

Prior to the UPU agreement, the Post had bilateral agreements with enumerated countries, starting with Norway from 1 June 1880. More countries, including Germany, were added from 1 April 1883.

Uprated Cards

Double cards with insufficient postage, normally cards intended for inland usage, should be uprated with stamps from the originating country. The response card should also be uprated with stamps from the originating country.

Uprated response cards is one of few situation where correctly used stamps are cancelled by the postal service of another country.

The glued paper on the back of the response card is against regulations, but was not observed. Maybe because that side was hidden when the card was folded.

Double postcard sent from Sweden to Germany, returned to Sweden and then forwarded twice; the first time within Sweden and then back to Germany. There are two interesting details:

- When forwarded the second time, an address label was used. The label is significantly larger than the regulated maximum size of 2x5 cm
- When forwarded, the card has been closed with sealing-wax. This was against regulations but passed without postage due

Response to Originating Country

After a decision at the UPU congress in Vienna 1891, it was only permitted to return response cards to their originating country.

It was not explicitly mentioned in the regulations if it was possible to forward response cards to a third country or not, but it should be permitted under general rules for forwarded mail.

Response Card Mistaken for Single Postcard

A common mistake by postal clerks was to incorrectly treat a correctly used response card for a single postcard from a foreign country.

Such mistakes are sometimes corrected by the post in the destination country and sometimes by the addressee who refused to pay postage due.

Response Card Used as Single Postcard

A common usage of double postcards was to tear them apart and use both cards as single postcards.

For international mail, one can distinguish a response card used as single postcard from a correctly used response card because the value stamp is cancelled in Sweden.
